Hi Kahmel, I really liked your research topic on the NFL. I have never really thought about how communication could play a part or affect the NFL, so I think that is super cool. I appreciated your reasoning for choosing this topic and find it to be very relevant to your interests. The first article you cited has lots of good work and is very supportive of your topic choice. The personal experience of the D.J. Johnson and how head on collisions affected him is great insight into the NFL and its effect in their communication.

The only thing I can say for improvement is for your second article link. It doesn't seem to be available when trying to open it. Just try to fix your citation and I think your post will be great.

Hi Melanie, I think your topic on books and which ones affect the development of the adolescent brain to be super fascinating. I also have always had an interest in the brain as well, so I think it would be a fun topic to pursue. I appreciate that you are choosing a topic that resonates with you, I feel that because of your genuine interest in your research will be extremely well done. For one of your articles, I was only able to read the preview because I need permission to access the full article; however, with reading the preview I can see that it is very relevant and can support your topic very well.

One thing you can improve on is going into more depth when introducing your second topic. I noticed you went into more detail when talking about your first topic. Besides that, I think your post was very well written.
